Early Origins of Male Violence:

A Bio-Psycho-Social and Infant Mental Health Approach to a Major Social Issue

By a very significant margin, most violence is committed by males. This conference examines the neurobiological, psychological, and social features seemingly unique to or predominant in the development of very young males. The conference addresses the question of how these factors may place boys at greater risk for this outcome starting in the prenatal, infant, and toddler periods.

Registration begins on January 15, 2019. Sign up now for announcements and updates at...

Who Should Attend?

The conference focuses on contemporary research in child development with special attention to early male development. This includes discussion of the social, psychological, developmental, neurological, genetic, epigenetic, evolutionary, and attachment research related to the early-in-life origins of male violence. Professionals working with boys and men in the fields of psychology, social work, criminology, gender development, child development, and child-oriented or crime-oriented policy makers will find this event of special interest, as will individuals concerned about violence by females and female victimization. Subjects addressed include:

- Early problematic attachment patterns and their later outcomes under complex social circumstances
- The neurobiology of infancy and the vulnerabilities of males that affect later violent behaviors.
- The genetic and epigenetic bases of later violent behavior
- Toddler predictors of adolescent antisocial behavior
- Longitudinal research/studies of the early roots of violent behavior in males
- Social and historical risk factors that “get under the skin” and contribute to the disproportion of violence occurring in some communities of color
- Human evolution and male violence
- The early-in-life roots of domestic violence, psychopathy, and mass murder

Call for Presentation Proposals

In addition to invited presenters, the conference provides opportunities for scholars, practitioners, and policy makers to present in symposia and workshops on subjects and research related to the theme of the conference.

Getting to Santa Fe, NM

The main access point to Santa Fe is the Albuquerque Sunport Airport (ABQ), 75 miles south of the city.
